

How to value arts and culture

Why we should be proactive in Queensland

PUBLIC LECTURE

Professor David Throsby

Most practitioners agree that the value of culture cannot be adequately expressed in terms of statistics. Audience numbers and gallery visitor profiles give a very impoverished picture of how culture enriches our communities.

What is needed is a new way of reflecting, recognising and capturing the full range of values expressed through arts and culture and then using a new rhetoric to secure greater support for the sector.

Recent overseas models have shown that specific valuation studies have been able to raise the profile of the cultural institutions and their services with key decision-makers by demonstrating the value of the sector to the state and national economy.

Where: Queensland Museum South Bank Theatre

When: Wednesday 2 April 2008

Time: 6pm - 7.15pm (to be followed by light refreshments)

Professor David Throsby

David Throsby is internationally known for his work in the economics of the arts and culture. His seminal work Economics and Culture was published in 2001. Professor Throsby is based at Macquarie University and his research and writing has covered the economic role of the visual and performing arts as well as cultural heritage, cultural development and policy and sustainability of cultural processes. More recently he co-edited The Handbook of the Economics of Art and Culture published in 2006. Professor Throsby works extensively in the UK and North America especially with the Getty Institute and with ICOM and UNESCO.

Museum Studies Program

for cultural diversity in human development
www.pacificasiaobservatory.org

queensland museum

